

University Academic Regulations

Office of the Registrar - Synthetic Benchmark Edition

1. Examination Policies

Final examinations are scheduled by the registrar to support integrity, accessibility, room utilization, and the orderly submission of grades. No instructor may move a final examination outside the approved examination period without written authorization from the academic scheduling office.

Students must present University identification at examinations and comply with seating, device, materials, and submission instructions. Possession of unauthorized notes, communication devices, or programmable resources is treated as an integrity matter even if the student asserts that the item was not used.

The regulation of examination policies is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under examination policies must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for examination policies. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under examination policies shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

The regulation of examination policies is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under examination policies must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for examination policies. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under examination policies shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

2. Make-up Exams & Incompletes

A make-up examination is an exceptional assessment arrangement used when a student was unable to complete a scheduled examination for a reason recognized by University policy. An incomplete grade is a temporary transcript notation used only when a small, clearly defined portion of work remains and the student was otherwise passing the course at the time the condition arose.

Make-up examinations shall ordinarily test the same learning outcomes as the missed assessment, but they need not use the same questions, format, or duration where security, comparability, or scheduling requires variation.

The regulation of make-up examinations and incompletes is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under make-up examinations and incompletes must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for make-up examinations and incompletes. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under make-up examinations and incompletes shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

The regulation of make-up examinations and incompletes is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under make-up examinations and incompletes must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for make-up examinations and incompletes. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under make-up examinations and incompletes shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

3. Credit Transfer Protocols

Credit transfer recognizes completed learning from another accredited institution when the content, level, credit volume, grading basis, and recency of the prior study are appropriate for the student's current program. Transfer credit is not awarded for informal learning, attendance without assessment, non-credit workshops, or professional experience unless a separate prior learning assessment process is approved.

Transfer credit decisions are recorded as institutional determinations and do not require the University to accept the sending institution's title, numbering system, or local classification of the course.

The regulation of credit transfer protocols is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under credit transfer protocols must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for credit transfer protocols. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under credit transfer protocols shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

The regulation of credit transfer protocols is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under credit transfer protocols must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for credit transfer protocols. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under credit transfer protocols shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

3.2 Medical Absence Petitions Affecting Assessed Work

Medical absence petitions require hospital documentation submitted within forty-eight (48) hours of the missed work to be eligible for an excused grade; petitions filed after that period shall be recorded for information only and shall not alter the grade.

Hospital documentation must identify the date of treatment, the relevant incapacity period, and the clinician or facility issuing the document. The University does not require a diagnosis where privacy law protects it, but it may require confirmation that the medical condition reasonably prevented completion of the assessment on the scheduled date.

A student requesting relief under medical absence petitions affecting assessed work must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for medical absence petitions affecting assessed work. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

4. Academic Probation & Disqualification

Academic probation is a formal warning that a student's cumulative or term performance has fallen below the minimum level required for satisfactory progress. Probation conditions may include credit limits, mandatory advising, repeated course plans, learning support, and restrictions on overload registration.

Academic disqualification may be imposed when a student fails to satisfy probation conditions, fails required professional standards, or demonstrates a pattern of performance inconsistent with continued enrollment in the program.

The regulation of academic probation and disqualification is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under academic probation and disqualification must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for academic probation and disqualification. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under academic probation and disqualification shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

The regulation of academic probation and disqualification is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under academic probation and disqualification must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for academic probation and disqualification. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under academic probation and disqualification shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

The regulation of academic probation and disqualification is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

5. Medical/Extenuating Leaves

A medical or extenuating leave permits a student to suspend enrollment for a defined period when circumstances substantially impair academic participation. Leave approval is not a disciplinary action and does not itself determine grades for work already attempted.

Students returning from leave must satisfy reactivation requirements, outstanding financial obligations, course sequencing rules, and any safety or placement clearance applicable to the program.

The regulation of medical and extenuating leaves is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under medical and extenuating leaves must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for medical and extenuating leaves. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under medical and extenuating leaves shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

The regulation of medical and extenuating leaves is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.

A student requesting relief under medical and extenuating leaves must supply complete documentation, identify the affected courses and assessments, and explain why ordinary academic remedies are inadequate. The University may reject incomplete requests without prejudice when essential facts are missing. A rejected request may be resubmitted only within the original deadline unless the policy expressly permits late filing. Staff members shall not promise a result before the authorized decision maker has reviewed the complete record.

Programs subject to external accreditation, clinical placement rules, studio safety requirements, or professional licensure conditions may adopt additional requirements for medical and extenuating leaves. Additional requirements must be published in the program handbook or course outline and must be consistent with University regulations unless a written accreditation standard requires otherwise. Where a conflict is alleged, the student bears the obligation to identify the specific provisions said to conflict and the office receiving the complaint shall transmit the issue to the registrar for record coordination.

Records created under medical and extenuating leaves shall be retained according to the academic records schedule. Email approvals, examination seating lists, grade rosters, transfer evaluations, leave decisions, and probation notices are official records when maintained in the approved system. Personal notes, draft spreadsheets, and informal advising comments do not amend the official record. The University may correct transcription errors, but it shall not change a final academic outcome merely because a later review suggests that a different discretionary decision could have been reasonable.

The regulation of medical and extenuating leaves is intended to preserve comparability among courses that differ in size, mode, disciplinary method, and assessment design. Academic units retain responsibility for pedagogy, but the registrar retains responsibility for records, deadlines, examination rosters, enrollment status, and the integrity of transcribed outcomes. The rule therefore distinguishes between academic judgment, which evaluates the quality of student work, and administrative eligibility, which determines whether work may be accepted, deferred, transferred, or recorded.